While the global transportation community is making great strides towards reducing emissions and finding ways to improve urban mobility, a growing number of cities are making environmentallyfriendly modes of transportation a focus. In its Best Practices for Transit-Oriented Development report, the United States Green Building Council (USGBC) asserts that "Transportation strategies should be considered when establishing new development and redevelopment of older properties." It also lists the benefits of transit-oriented development (TOD) plans, which promote more efficient travel and development patterns. Using multiple transit modes to connect jobs and communities also reduces emissions. The Transit Center for Toronto's Uptown Station This idea of using transit to maximize density and reduce emissions is already working well in some American cities such as Portland, Oregon. In Portland, the city plans to connect a portion of its streetcar lines to the eastern end of the Pearl District, or inner core. The goal of this plan is to improve service in the area and open up more land for development. Portland added a streetcar route in the city's Uptown neighborhood, with an extension to the Pearl District. This route provides service to the old Portland Tobacy station and has also connected to private, multimodal, transit systems for both commuters and tourists. This provides a win-win scenario for both the city and area's local businesses and residents. The Uptown streetcar, in particular, has been a success in creating a lively, mixed-use neighborhood and attracting
