After I have done a few grouting tasks in my bathrooms, the shower cubicle stopped working and I noticed that the bolts in the door were rusty. I looked at the door and the bolts looked like the surface of the bolts had been turned a dark red colour. What I have done, if I can use the right terminology, is that I have replaced a couple of screws in the lower-left corner, re-boring the original holes for the screws that were rusty with an electric screwdriver. I have removed the screws that were rusty and either used a screwdriver to reshape them (which I don't have) or have installed new screws. I have removed the rusted bolts and have either bought a new bolt with the same diameter as the bolt in its place or have put new bolts on. When I thought about the colour of the rusty bolts, I was assuming it was because I had not had them polished or cleaned and oiled as the previous owner had. I have now thought about the colour and that maybe I should have treated the rusty bolts differently. So, is there anything that I can do to stop the colour from happening or is the only solution to just seal them off and wait for the rust to wear off? A: Those are probably steel bolts, and they got rusty when they got in contact with rust. The process was probably like this: Steel bolts get
