This actually sounds like a good idea and should be tested next time. To answer the question: Yes, that is exactly what redshift is. You may consider implementing an alternate redshift test using the HP 8701, which is a non-destructive method that measures the reflection coefficient. The hot gas produced by the coke-limestone reaction is brought out from the furnace and conveyed to a dust collection system. The hot gas is cooled prior to being conveyed to the dust collection system. The dust collected at the dust collection system is processed and the processed powder is recycled to react with the coke in the furnace chamber. A few problems with this prior art system are as follows: 1) The dust collection system that uses an electrostatic dust collector is generally less efficient at removing all the powder than the dust collection system that uses vibratory or mechanical means. 2) The vibratory or mechanical means used in the dust collection system is susceptible[1693] designed for removing powder that is removed by the dust collection system, but is unable to remove powder that is in the form of a suspension of water. In the blast furnace using a typical vibratory or mechanical means, powder is mixed with water such that powder is suspended in water.
